But the tarantula need not be held in such great fear, for I doubt if one of its bites out of a hundred proves fatal. All the talk we hear of the tarantula dance—of the bitten person dancing himself to death—its arrant nonsense. Probably the most venomous creature in the world—the one we really need to fear—is the ratone we really need to lear—is the fat-tlesnake. But even the bite of the rattlesnake in the majority of cases fails to kill. Take, though, a well-grown Florida rattler of six or seven Giron, but it is not intentional on either feet, one that hasn't emptied his poison sacs for a month or more, and if he should nip you in a place where there is an abundant circulation of the blood, you would probably die. A big rattlesnake, when his poison saes are full, can eject a tablespoonful of venom. Yet whisky, even here, might save you."—
